Read the following text carefully, and then in your ANSWER BOOKLET answer all the questions that follow. Your answers should be based on the text.

Last year, Fahd had a serious car accident, in which he nearly died. But although he survived, he lost the use of his hands in the accident. As a computer programmer, Fahd used to spend all day at work using a computer keyboard. But how has he managed since his accident? Amazingly, although he is injured, Fahd continues to work as a computer programmer. Using new speech recognition software, Fahd now talks to his computer, and no longer uses a traditional keyboard. But you don't have to be injured like Fahd to use speech recognition technology. New speech recognition technology is useful because talking to a computer is quicker than using a keyboard, and it is a more natural way of communicating than writing.

The first speech recognition programmes could not change speech into written language but they could obey spoken commands, like 'Close' or 'Save document'. Most modern programmes can recognise continuous speech, but users must read a few test texts to train the programme to understand the sound of their voice.

There are simpler speech recognition programmes which are able to understand anybody who uses them, and they have only a very small vocabulary. Systems like these are used in telephone information services where users are given a small choice of words to say.

Question Number One (23 points)

1. What is Fahd's job? (3 points)
2. How was Fahd injured? (3 points)
3. There are two benefits of using new speech recognition technology. Write them down. (4 points)
4. Find a word in the last paragraph which means "processes". (3 points)
5. What does the underlined pronoun "who" refer to? (3 points)
6. What are the characteristics of the first speech recognition programmes? (4 points)
7. Why must users of modern recognition programmes read a few test texts? (3 points)
